As the story at left illustrates, coaches must be continuously guarded in their language and actions. Coaches can be drawn into casual conversation and make comments that violate trust. Trust, which often takes years to build, can be destroyed in seconds without thought.

By intentionally focusing on trust, however, organizations and individuals can endure fallout from everyday problems and more monumental crises. For example, Isadore Sharp, founder, CEO, and chairman of the Four Seasons hotel chain, attributes much of his organization’s success to building trust with employees and customers. “We can’t communicate effectively across a trust gap. ... So I sat down with our public relations director and detailed a formal credo based on the Golden Rule, the cornerstone of what would be called our corporate culture” (Beslin & Reddin, 2006, p. 1).

Deloitte Canada, like many accounting firms, has had fallout from corporate ethics scandals. In an e-conference of the Deloitte Leaders Forum in June 2005, Deloitte Canada CEO Alan MacGibbon stressed the need for leaders to initiate change and act decisively. “Trust is a concept that is so fundamentally important yet so hard to define, earn, and keep,” MacGibbon said. “Moral and ethical leadership is perhaps the single most important contributor to success over the long haul” (Beslin & Reddin, 2006, p. 1).

Stephen M.R. Covey (2008) described 13 trust behaviors: Talk straight, demonstrate respect, create transparency, right wrongs, show loyalty, deliver results, get better, confront reality, clarify expectations, practice accountability, listen first, keep commitments, and extend trust. The coach’s role is to help leaders develop and model the character traits that lead to trusting relationships. And a coach’s success in doing so depends on the coach’s own trustworthiness. Developing trust requires coaches to take on moral leadership and develop bonds with those they coach in order to model trust throughout the school.

In the teachers lounge scenario, an effective coach, knowing her role and how trust was being violated, might have intervened. What might have been the outcome by the end of the day if the coach had asked the group of teachers some thoughtful questions: “I wonder if there is any real evidence that cheating took place? Is what we are talking about now going to facilitate our working together well in the future or hinder it? What other conversations should we be having right now? I wonder what we could be learning from her classroom, or how her strategies and ideas might contribute to all of our learning?”

The coach might have chosen many questions that would nurture and build trust in the organization, allow others to see the coach as trustworthy, and build positive energy in the organization.

As people focus energy and work on developing their own trustworthiness, they become like a mighty oak tree. In Austin, Texas, an ancient grove of oak trees known as the Council Oaks were, according to Native American legend, the location for launching war parties and for hosting peace treaties. Beneath one of these trees, Native Americans reportedly signed a treaty with settlers, represented by Stephen F. Austin. That tree now is known as the Treaty Oak.

In 1989, the tree was vandalized, poisoned with such a powerful hardwood herbicide that scientists were certain it would die. Lab tests showed the oak had received enough poison to kill 100 trees. However, the Treaty Oak survived. Eight years later, it once again produced a crop of acorns. City workers gathered and germinated the acorns, then distributed the seedlings throughout Texas. Two decades after the poisoning, the tree is thriving, although its shape is a reminder of its struggle to survive. Many Texans see the Treaty Oak as a symbol of strength and endurance.

Like the Treaty Oak, good coaches remain constant, symbols of strength and endurance through life’s vicissitudes. People who understand their values and what is important to them are able to nurture relationships. But to build the trust that sustains relationships over time, coaches work to develop at least six traits based on the work of Daniel Goleman (2002), Megan Tschannen-Moran (2004), Julio Olalla (2003), and Stephen Covey (2008).

THE SIX TRUSTY OAK ROOTS

A “trusty oak” coach has six essential deep roots: self-awareness, honesty, sincerity, competence, reliability, and the ability to be other-centered.

1 Self-awareness

Effective coaches have a deep sense of their own values and live by those values in such a way that others cannot doubt their principles. In The Learning Educator (2007), Stephanie Hirsh and Joellen Killion state, “Each person lives by a set of principles. Some of our principles are unquestioned and fundamental to who we are. Some are new to us, and through our experiences and dialogue we continue to clarify and deepen our understanding of them. Our principles guide our work, thoughts, goals, actions, and decisions” (p. 11). Dennis Sparks (2007) says we become clearer about who we are by making clear our assumptions in writing and by talking with others about them. Effective coaches spend time reflecting on and articulating the principles that guide their actions and attitudes. When self-awareness is practiced regularly as a skill, it becomes an essential part of the coach’s character.

2 Honesty
In a training session on strategic planning, administrators in the group were discussing how they shared district student performance data with the public. One participant said he struggled with sharing data when the news was not good. The facilitator, without much thought, agreed.

Then a superintendent spoke up. “Is it really difficult to tell the truth?” he asked.

Although the facilitator and the administrator may have been referring to the challenges of sharing bad news, the superintendent who spoke out never forgot the facilitator’s comment. She lost his trust, and he subsequently dismissed all she had to say.

Building trusting relationships is not about how honest we think we are. It is how honest others believe us to be. Truth releases the power of positive change. We build meaningful, healthy relationships and become positive role models for others through self-examination and being honest with ourselves and others.

3 Sincerity
In today’s fast-paced world, it is tempting to overcommit and make promises we do not really want to keep. When we hastily respond to an email, glance furtively at a phone message, or jot a note on a to-do list when with another person, we are not totally focused or present, and that is obvious to the listener. Distractions keep our minds floating from issue to issue and cut our conversations short. The pressures of pending commitments keep us from listening. Effective coaches are truly present in the moment.

Sincerity requires that people follow through on those actions that they really are committed to doing. They plan and schedule appropriate time for those tasks they want to make their priorities.

Competent people inspire trust. Competent people have the skills, attitudes, and dispositions to achieve what they say they can. Taking on challenges outside one’s area of expertise can be tempting, but staying focused in one’s area of competence is essential to having others pay attention to the coach or leader and to feel confident in the leader. The coach’s competence gives others the courage to act.

Aggressive learners are most likely to be viewed as competent. As Eric Hoffer states: “In times of drastic change, learners inherit the Earth, while the learned find themselves beautifully equipped to work in a world that no longer exists” (2008, p. 32). Competence is developed through continuous learning.

5 Reliability
The root of reliability is the most easily severed as people... attempt more in limited time. Those who are reliable can be counted on to keep their promises. Samuel Hamlin chose to participate in a three-year principal development coalition. In three years, he never missed a session. When his children were sick or he had a crisis at school, he found someone to help him so that he honored his commitment.

At the last session, he seemed tired. The leader asked if he was OK. Hamlin replied, “I am tired. I attended my aunt’s funeral yesterday, and I’ve driven all night to be here this morning.” Hamlin’s commitments were meaningful to him.

Administrators often find themselves in a meeting running overtime or caught by someone who just has to talk, or lost in a phone call with an angry parent. While these may be excuses for not meeting a commitment, they are not reasons. No matter how many apologies are given, others’ recall of the situation will be the failure to honor a commitment.

Phil Blake, president of Bayer, said, “It’s all about authenticity ... plus consistency that you will always perform according to the contract of understanding. You’re doing the right things for the right reasons and what’s best for all” (Beslin & Reddin, 2006, p. 30).

Effective coaches honor others as they would want to be honored. When coaches are transparent, honest, and forthright with issues they are facing, others grow more confident they are what they say they are and that they can be counted on.

6 Intentions

Highly effective coaches have the best intentions for those they coach. They accept people for who they are — brilliant, wonderful gifts to the planet — and want them to succeed. Jim Meehan, British psychologist and poet, puts it this way: “Having spent many years trying to define the essentials of trust, I arrived at the position that if two people could say two things to each other and mean them, then there was the basis for real trust. The two things were ‘I mean you no harm’ and ‘I seek your greatest good ’ ” (Covey, 2008, p. 80). The best coaches’ motives are other-centered.

TAXES AND DIVIDENDS

Trust takes time to earn and can be destroyed almost instantly. Covey uses the idea of taxes and dividends to explain.

Positive, high levels of trust in relationships with others and in organizations produce joy, effortless communication, transparent relationships, and high levels of energy — dividends. Organizations with low trust relationships have unhealthy working environments, hostility, guarded communication, defensiveness, and constant worry and suspicion (Covey, 2008, pp. 22-24).

Feeding trust results in greater dividends, while mistrust taxes everyone and has long-term costs to relationships. Effective coaches strive to constantly earn dividends with those they coach.

Covey outlines four ways leaders build dividends:

- Inspire trust. Believe in others’ capacity to live up to expectations, to deliver on promises, and to achieve clarity on key goals. Avoid micromanaging and second-guessing.
- Clarify purpose. Involve others in creating the goals to be achieved. When people are involved in the process, they psychologically own the goals and share the mission, vision, and values.
- Align systems. Match what is said to what is measured. Organizations often claim, for example, that people are important but have structures and systems that identify professional learning as an expense or cost rather than an asset and investment in their people.
- Unleash talent. Empower others by aligning systems and developing a shared purpose. When people feel empowered, the organization benefits from their capacity, intelligence, creativity, and resourcefulness.

REFERENCES

Kay Psencik (kay.psencik@outlook.com) is a senior consultant for Learning Forward who coaches teachers, principals, and district leaders in addition to facilitating school- and district-level improvement initiatives.
PHILOSOPHY of COACHING

By Kay Psencik

Great coaching is an art. It involves skillfully asking questions and challenging assumptions. Coaching opens participants to changing the way they think about themselves, their leadership, and the opportunities they have to shape their own futures and the future of their schools. Coaching does not mean telling others what to do or how to solve their problems. It is not training. It is not being an empathetic friend. Coaching helps those being coached grow more confident and competent in leading and learning.

Here is a sample of one coach’s philosophy of coaching. Use the form on p. 57 to develop your own philosophy of coaching.

The values that guide my actions in coaching others:

- I care greatly about my coachee’s success. I will do whatever it takes to listen well, to be thoughtful about my questions, and to learn aggressively how to coach well.
- I will treat the coachee with respect at all times. I will keep my coachee’s confidence. I will build trust by being reliable.
- I will focus on developing my coachee’s competence and confidence to lead. Both are significantly important to being respected by others.
- I will listen from the coachee’s point of view. I know I have experiences that shaped my leadership, but my experiences are not my coachee’s experiences, my solutions not his solutions.

My beliefs about learning:

- Learning means changing behavior.
- Learning is energizing and a powerful force in a leader’s success in complex times and within complex organizations.
- Learning is collaborative and organic. The more I work with others, the faster and better I learn.

My hopes and aspirations for those I coach:

I hope that they develop the skills, attitudes, dispositions, and behaviors essential to lead communities where all are learning aggressively.

My purpose in coaching principals:

I want to watch school leaders grow and learn so that more children in our community and nation are skilled, confident, and ready for the challenges they will face when they leave K-12 education.

The things I need to learn to be more effective as a coach:

- To listen well and ask strategic questions.
- To develop the wisdom and thoughtfulness to lead others to discover who they are, what they are learning, and the power they have to shape their futures and the futures of others.
ESTABLISH YOUR OWN

PHILOSOPHY of COACHING

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>The values that guide my actions in coaching others:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>My beliefs about learning:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>My purpose in coaching principals:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>My hopes and aspirations for those I coach:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>The things I need to learn to be more effective as a coach:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>