

Katie Shuman is a Curriculum Specialist at CenterPoint where she manages the early literacy initiative for District 19 in Brooklyn, New York. Katie works with the elementary schools in the district as they make a transition to a blended learning model. Katie also provides content and curriculum development and support in early literacy for school and district clients nationally.

Katie began her career as a reading specialist where she taught differentiated literacy instruction to elementary and middle school students. She continued her career as a reading and literacy program manager in the non-profit sector providing professional development, training, and support in early literacy intervention to schools and individual literacy coaches across 14 districts in the New York City Department of Education. Most recently, Katie served as director of literacy at a public charter network elementary school where she oversaw the school's literacy program.

Katie earned her master's degree as a Reading Specialist from Teachers College, Columbia University and her honors bachelor's degree in Childhood Education and English from the State University of New York College at Cortland. She also was selected as a fellow for the Princeton Alumni Corps Emerging Leaders Program, focused on non-profit management and leadership.
