Learning Forward
THE PROFESSIONAL LEARNING ASSOCIATION
Our readers are education leaders

Learning Forward is the only association devoted to improving student results through advocacy and support for high-quality professional learning. Our readers and website visitors are education leaders – superintendents, central office leaders, principals, instructional coaches, and state and regional leaders.

More than 70,000 readers come to our publications and website to find the answers they need to solve learning challenges for both staff and students. Our bimonthly professional magazine, The Learning Professional, is their source to learn more about critical issues in the field. Connect, our monthly e-newsletter keeps them up to date with our organization, and Professional Learning News, our weekly news brief, ensures they stay connected to what is happening across the nation and around the world.

“Learning Forward is real time PD. I can read JSD [Now The Learning Professional] over a quick lunch and be ready with multiple strategies and ideas for my afternoon staff meeting.”

<td>Evaluating professional learning&lt;br&gt;Evaluation is essential for ensuring professional learning is having the impacts we intend. It can help us learn what's working and what we need to change, and whether educator practices and student outcomes are improving. This issue will look at the most up-to-date evaluation models, methods, and findings. Articles might address levels of evaluation (e.g., changes in knowledge, attitudes, skills, practices, student outcomes); data collection methods; practical evaluation measures; putting findings into practice; and how to engage teachers in designing and learning from evaluations. Articles describing the findings of evaluation studies are also encouraged.</td>

<td>Technology and the future of learning&lt;br&gt;This issue will examine the rapidly changing face of technology in professional learning. What roles can and should technology play in coaching, PLCs, new teacher induction, and other forms of educator support? And in a world rich with ed tech innovations, how can professional learning prepare and support educators to use the latest technology in the classroom? Additional topics might include: the professional learning needs of technology directors and other school and district technology leaders; technology tools for pinpointing student learning needs in real-time; how technology can support the successful implementation of high-quality curriculum; the potential and pitfalls of AI in professional learning; and when not to use technology for professional learning.</td>

<td>Learning to pivot&lt;br&gt;Teachers and schools have to pivot all the time, in ways both big and small, whether to incorporate new research, adapt to changing student needs, or address a crisis like the Covid-19 pandemic. This issue will examine opportunities and moments where educators and systems have needed or wanted to pivot and how professional learning enabled them to make needed changes. Topics might include: how efforts to incorporate the science of reading are leveraging professional learning to shift practice; what teachers need to know and do differently as a result of post-Covid learning trajectories; the role of data in assessing and improving professional learning – and what to do when data shows your current practices aren't working; and how to introduce or improve professional learning in a system that is resistant to change.</td>

<td>Curriculum-based professional learning&lt;br&gt;High-quality curricula and instructional materials are essential for students to master content and meet academic standards, but they are not enough on their own. Teachers and leaders need and deserve professional learning to support deep understanding and high-quality implementation of the materials. This issue will take a deep dive into curriculum-based professional learning methods, initiatives, and research. It will include examples of how curriculum-based professional learning is changing educators' practice and improving students' outcomes.</td>

<td>Building bridges&lt;br&gt;Meaningful professional learning doesn't happen in isolation, nor does it occur at a single moment in time. It requires an ongoing continuum of support and a long-term plan that includes multiple stakeholders and systems. This issue will look at why and how bridge-building is essential for professional learning to achieve results. Topics of interest include: partnerships between pre-service teacher education and ongoing professional learning; connections between alternative certification programs and district professional learning; alignment of professional learning for teachers and leaders; how to ensure professional learning is part of district and school improvement plans; and professional learning that connects educators across schools or districts.</td>
